The New York Post has long been, for good reasons, a great favorite with American readers. Even those who disagreed with some of its most cherished sentiments exteemed the Post for the charm of its tone, the calm but kindly impress that nervaded its sentiments, the candid, hearty fairness with which is treated the utterances of those from whom it differed. It pains us to say that estimable as is the Post of to-day, and much re we adpetals, something from the ichor in its veins, As an instance—the Post recently referred to an article on crime North and South that appeared in the APPEAL, an article in which the subject was treated without that partisan and sectional spirit that has too often distorted truth and encouraged vindictive feel ing. The Post states that the Memphis AP PEAL admits the difficulty of instituting comparisons between the two sections of the country by means of prison statistics; and that is admits of a desire over a large part of the Union to secure immigration; and acknowledges that a service has been rendered by a wesk point in the armor of the South being pointed out. Admissions and acknowledgments occur in argument, in attack and defence, but the article of the APPEAL was not argumentative, not one accusing and defending. On the contrary, it expressly refused "to return gall for bitterness" to those who had made unkindly charges or criticisms. The APPEAL, commenting upon statistics given in a Southern paper, taking the position of a fair and candid contemplation of the figures before it, had neither admissions not acknowledgemnts to make, excuses to offer. or pleas to urge. It simply stated some dislike to face facts which was neither felt if we regard the terms it uses as disingenuous long supported.
